From the President...

Dear PSNM Friends —

Our Arts Alliance show entitled “New to the Scene” will open Friday, May 1st, with a reception from 5 - 8 pm. I hope many of you will be there. It takes courage to begin showing your artwork in public places. Let’s show support for our members who are “new to the scene.” The Arts Alliance Gallery is located in the Courtyard Shops at the Northeast corner of Lomas and San Mateo. In case you miss the first one, a second reception will be held during Artscrawl on Friday, May 15th from 5 - 8 pm. The show will be open to the public during Arts Alliance business hours from 8 am - 5 pm each weekday.

At our April meeting, we experienced the projection of the demonstration by James Roybal onto a screen. We would like to know your reaction and what you consider to be the pros and cons of doing this. I’m suggesting that you send one of the officers an email and share your views. We will be discussing this topic at the next board meeting.

Hopefully, by the time this is published, our winter will have made its exit. As I am writing this in the middle of April it is snowing outside. Look around, get inspired and paint, paint, paint. The deadlines for our National Show are fast approaching. Don’t forget about the smaller works (48 sq in. limit) portion of the show. The prospectus for Small Works Show is on page 8 of this newsletter and will also be available on our website. The National Show Prospectus is still being finalized. It will be sent via email soon.

Safe and Secure Shipping

Dave Kohlmann, owner of Art Delivery Service, will demonstrate tried and proven techniques for the safe packing of artwork. His emphasis will be on pieces that are framed and under glass. Dave will also identify products you can use to safely ship your artwork as well as discuss safer options for shipping artwork including hand delivery.

Since 1998, Art Delivery Service has been providing very specialized service to art galleries and artists, art consultants and collectors, antique dealers and private clients. They provide soft wrap delivery, custom crating, packing and shipping of fine art including paintings, sculptures, pottery and other fragile artwork, getting your artwork to where it needs to be delivered - from artist to gallery or client, art shows and museums. They ship globally and deliver in their own trucks throughout Texas, Oklahoma, New Mexico, Arizona and California.

Madonna Daniel Award

PSNM is pleased to be able to support the endeavors of emerging artists who demonstrate a commitment to their artwork, their on-going education, and the arts community in which they live. This year, PSNM donated $350 to The Harwood Emerging Artist Fund for the Madonna Daniel Award.

The selection committee first met to review the written applications, letters of recommendation and images submitted by the four artists who had applied for the award this year. Subsequently the committee met with the two semi-finalists, both of whom were ultimately chosen to receive the award.

Katharine (Kat) Kinnick is a sophomore at Sandia Prep. She shows amazing maturity as an artist. She already is exhibiting her work and has made plans to attend a pre-college summer art program. In addition to art classes at Sandia Prep, she has also attended art classes at Harwood.

Travis Farnsworth, who received his BFA from UNM in 2008, is currently working on a new series of mixed media sculptures for his first solo show. He has participated in several exhibitions and won a Student Choice award. Travis also contributes to the art community by working with people with disabilities.

April Program Review

by Jane Maclean

James Roybal: “Simplify and Magnify”

11:00 AM — The stage was being set... lights, camera, screen. James Roybal was preparing to show how he uses a photographic reference to create his painting. The camera and screen gave all in the auditorium a close-up view of his work. He distributed to the group prints of the photo that he would be using for this demonstration. It is a winter landscape that includes an area of water and fallen logs.

James likes to use Museum grade Wallis paper, but sometimes he uses the Professional grade. This paper today is bonded to a hard surface. With broad, confident strokes, and the quick movements of a master, he blocked in the major shapes of the composition with a watercolor wash. The colors are medium blue and yellow. He occasionally does a thumbnail size arrangement, but prefers to do the compositional process with watercolor. He turned the panel 90 degrees to direct the movement of the drips. He is looking for “accidents.” As he works, he explains that he wants to “Kill the white.” Sometimes he uses a sponge to change the look with a textured appearance. In a few minutes the composition is laid out, and he is using a hair drier to dry the watercolor under-painting.

“Good painting starts with abstract shapes,” James says, as he assesses the image before him. Usually he paints from dark to light, but this time he will start the sky with light blue, before he switches to the darks. As he paints, he uses a large variety of pastels, often employing the edge of the pastel, finishing the strong stroke with a light, dragging movement to get a softer effect. He uses the pastel more like a pallet knife than a pencil. He lays in dark lines throughout the image, switching to a light color to block in the light shapes. “Paint the shapes and color you see, not what you think it is,” he cautions. James likes to leave some watercolor showing, if he thinks it works to the benefit the painting. “I like to simplify the image,” he says, as he focuses on certain trees, and eliminates others. James is working all over the surface, with a selection of pastels in his hand.

11:25 — He is still working on trees and sky, and beginning to suggest a mountain in the distance. James uses black, but modifies it with color. To continue the lines, he doesn’t mind painting off the page.

11:34 — Some of the darker detail is being applied. James refers to the photo every few seconds. Light and dark are now coming together to create form in the logs, trees, and water. “When you think your painting needs something, usually you need to take something out,” he advises. He glazes over the surface of the water to get different effects. Then he comes in with a more neutral value, a muted peachy color, to tie in the areas of high contrast, producing a mixing of color. His favorite pencil is a charcoal pencil, and he uses it in broken lines for detail.

11:41 — Large shapes are being connected with either the same value or a lighter value. James’ favorite snow colors are three Schmincke shades of blue, light to medium values. Two of them have touches of lavender.

11:45 to 11:56 — James continues to fill in with medium values, bringing out the light in selected areas, setting the shapes. “Every color should be in every area of the painting,” he says. He continues to combine big patterns. “It is better to stop for a while than to overwork the painting,” he suggests. Throughout the demonstration, James fields questions from the group. He is obviously comfortable talking and painting at the same time. When he gets back to his studio, it can take anywhere from one half hour to the rest of the day to finish the painting.

But this day, from under the lights, a talented, confident painter has shared his skills.
